A revolution is building in Palestine

Comment & analysis

When winning is losing

How the 1967 War changed Palestine and Israel, writes Ramzy Baroud

The three-week-old baby Joshua’s death triggered a series of events that left the Middle East reeling. The baby was among dozens of children killed by Israeli forces in a rampage across Palestinian communities over the course of four days, which left 63 people dead, including 14 children. The events have sparked outrage and condemnation around the world, as Israel’s actions have been widely described as war crimes.

Israel’s actions in the occupied territories have been met with growing resistance from the Palestinian people. Despite decades of conflict, the Palestinian people continue to fight for their right to self-determination and freedom.

In the aftermath of the baby Joshua’s death, calls for justice have become louder, as the international community continues to demand that Israel respect human rights and international law.

The baby Joshua’s death has highlighted the ongoing suffering of the Palestinian people, and has underscored the need for a just and peaceful solution to the conflict. The future of the Middle East depends on finding a way forward that respects the rights of all people, and ensures a future of peace and prosperity for all.

The baby Joshua’s death is a stark reminder of the ongoing struggle for Palestinian freedom and rights. As the world watches, we must stand together to demand justice, and to support the Palestinian people in their fight for a better future.

Ramzy Baroud is a Palestinian journalist and political analyst. He is the editor-in-chief of The Palestine Chronicle, a leading international news source that covers the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and the Middle East region.